Editorial

November has been a relatively volatile month as reflected in the number of orders and price updates. More than 1.3 billion orders and price updates were received on warrants & certificates, making it the most volatile month since November last year (1.8 billion), while the number of listings in November 2012 was 11% more than November last year.

In terms of trading activity, when compared to the 2012 average, the value traded in November is down by 15% and the number of transactions is down by 8%, but the number of orders and price updates received is up by 15%.

Interestingly, the figures for our two biggest markets, NYSE Euronext Amsterdam and NYSE Euronext Paris, are exactly the same, since the activity on both markets has developed in the same way.

Looking at the activity per product type, Leverage Knock-Out Open-End products are still attracting by far the majority of interest from investors, with over 58% of the traded value and nearly 52% of the transactions. Leverage and Short certificates have regained some ground after their noticeable drop in August 2012. In November 2012, nearly 16% of the value traded and 11% of the transactions on Warrants & Certificates were done on Leverage and Short certificates.

On 28 September 2012, Extended Trading Hours (E.T.H.) were launched on NYSE Euronext Paris. After two months with these extended hours in place, the results are quite positive. Five issuers are already offering some of their products in E.T.H., for a total of close to 6,000 W&Cs available for trading between 08:00 and 09:05 CET (early trading) and close to 6,700 W&Cs available for trading between 17:30 and 18:30 CET (late trading).

In early trading, the number of orders received (excluding orders received during market pre-opening) is nearly 70% of the hourly average of the number of orders received during normal trading hours. In terms of number of transactions, the figure is closer to 67%.

Late trading has been a little bit less active with 43% and 47% of the hourly average number of trades and transactions during normal trading hours.
